Introduction

An offer of free land was hard to resist. The Donation Land Claim Act of 1850 offered just that in Oregon Territory's Willamette Valley. The act became law on September 27, 1850. For those living in the Territory, or who arrived before the December 1, 1850 deadline, the grant was 320 acres for a male citizen (or those who had legally declared intention to become a citizen) or 640 acres to a married couple. This legitimized the provisional land claims made before the 1850 act. Disallowed from land were African Americans and Indians, but American Indian half-breeds could apply.

Those arriving in Oregon after the December 1, 1850 deadline and before December 1, 1855 (the expiration of the law) were eligible to receive half the amount of donation land. The size of the land piece was dependent upon the date of arrival and the marital status of the claimant. The law allowed for 320 acres of designated land free to a married man and his wife. A single man was eligible for 160 acres. In an extension of the law in 1854 land was available but sold for $1.25 per acre, with the cap of 320 acres. After 1862 the Homestead Law applied to Oregon land. Claimants were to live on the land and cultivate it for four years and after having done so would own it outright.<sup>1</sup> The potential for a nice homestead in Oregon was motivation for tens of thousands of white settlers to migrate to the Oregon Territory from 1850 through 1855.

The Oregon Trail extended from western Missouri across the Great Plains into the Rocky Mountains to Oregon City, Oregon. Used in the 1840s, 1850s and 1860s it was most heavily used in 1852. It was the longest historic overland migration trail in North America. The length of the wagon trail from the Missouri River to the Willamette Valley was about 2,000 miles. It normally took four to six months to traverse the length with wagons pulled by oxen. About 80,000 pioneers used it to reach Oregon, and about 20,000 to Washington before the transcontinental railroad in 1869.<sup>2</sup>

Objectives

At the end of this presentation you will be able to:

- Understand the genealogical value of the Oregon Donation Land Claim files.
- Access the indexes and original application files.
- Find helpful websites for history, journals, maps and more.

Genealogical Value of the Donation Land Claim Files

A Donation Land Claim file abounds in genealogically valuable information. The original application file will be the most valuable of the records associated with a Donation Land Claim. The following are often contained in a file.

- |                          |                        |
|--------------------------|------------------------|
| 1. full name             | 6. former residence    |
| 2. birth information     | 7. Oregon arrival date |
| 3. marriage verification | 8. claim dates         |
| 4. name of spouse        | 9. land description    |
| 5. relationships         | 10. citizenship        |

Finding the Land Office and the Claim Number

Finding your ancestor in an index is the first step. Indexes are readily available in many forms. Most indexes include the land office and the numbers you need to locate the original file. Indexes are found at the websites listed below and many other places.

Accessing the Original Files

It is the original application file which contains the genealogical goodies. Once you have found the land office and the claim certificate number you are ready to find the application.

The National Archives and Records Administration

The original copies of the Donation Land Claims are held at the National Archives in Washington, D.C. They are free if you personally go to the archive, but cost if you order them.

The National Archives at Seattle - Pacific Alaskan Branch

Microfilm copies of the original files are available at the National Archives at Seattle branch. They are free if you personally go to the archive, but cost if you order them.

FamilySearch

FamilySearch has digitized the microfilm copies of the original application files and placed them online for free. The files are organized by land office and then by donation certificate number. First, find the correct land office and then locate the record set for the certificate number. Claims that were cancelled are also in this record set.
